NURSING NEWS AND ANNOUNCEMENTS

A committee was appointed to draw up a bill for the licensing of attendants, which is to be presented to the Legislature. The association had as speakers, Adda Eldredge, the Interstate Secretary, who discussed some of the problems of reorganization, and Mary S. Gardner, whose topic was Public Health Work. #### WITH MILITARY HONORS

At 6.15 p. m. on Thursday, January 17, 1918, Amabel S. Roberts, R.N., Army Nurse Corps No. 1 (Presbyterian U. S. A.) General Hospital, British Expeditionary Force, attached to No. 2 Reserve Base Hospital, Etretat, France, gave up the life she had devoted to the service of others. Her illness, one of the most deadly of infections, had lasted barely three days.

At 1.40 p. m. on Saturday the troops assembled in the Square for parade. The British other ranks, including all patients from the hospitals who were able to walk, fell in first under the command of Sergeant Major King. Then the Americans, every man who could be spared from duty, numbering about two-thirds of the Unit, formed at the command of Sergeant Hinds.

The services were to be at the Blanquet, the nurses' quarters, and in a moment the narrow street was choked with troops who formed in a long double rank on either side of the street leading to the gate. For fifteen minutes the men stood at attention while the simple services were being held inside the Blanquet, and then the leaden casket was brought out and placed on a stretcher carriage covered with flags. The carriage moved slowly down the street between the two ranks of men who uncovered as it passed, and as it reached the end of the lines the files telescoped on themselves and fell in behind.

The two Padres came first, marching together, and followed by the bugler; then the casket on the stretcher carriage with the pall bearers, the honorary pall bearers marching behind. After these came the nurses, followed by the V. A. D.'s and lady drivers, and officers. Next in line were the American troops, and after them came the poilus from the French hospital near by; behind these were the British troops, and after them the British patients from our own hospitals. The French townspeople, headed by the Mayor, came last.

It was an impressive procession. About five hundred were in line and the torturingly slow, rhythmic beat of the funeral half-step was like a motif which told of the implacability of Fate against which man breaks himself eternally. But the masses of flowers that buried the casket flamed and blossomed against the background of sombre uniforms like an eternal promise which raises itself triumphantly over an eternal pain. All the flowers that Havre could provide were there. The Unit gave them, and after the Unit the patients insisted that they be permitted to give, too. The French gave all they had. The dark blue uniforms of the nurses blended with the blue and leather of the drivers, and both these were relieved by the flowing white head dresses of the V. A. D's. And then the olive drab as the officers marched past heading the solid ranks of men in a long column of fours, with the horizon blue of the poilus following. One felt sure, somehow, that she would have been glad to know the poilus were there. They were all wounded, and some of them hobbled along on sticks, while one or two gave an arm to a comrade who had risked his strength to come. Among them stalked a tall Arab, his head held high, his face passive and immovable; only his eyes smouldered with that pride and scorn that had faced death and won in Flanders. More khaki as the British came, and then the patients. Some of them wore their uniform coats, but all of them were in blues, that strange, ill-fitting garb of the convalescent. After these came all Etretat, women and old men unfit for service. So many have gone and so few have come again. They were there to pay their tribute, and so they came—some in clumping wooden shoes, some leading little children, the lame, the halt, and the blind, the old, and the weak—they knew of bitter experience, and they could sympathize. It was not an impersonal sorrow that the French gave. They knew her. A nurse from the French hospital sobbed out her grief as she told how tenderly Miss Roberts had carried her little Alex who now stumps bravely about on his wooden peg. Alex was so small, and in so great pain that he could not always make his wants intelligible, and it was Miss Roberts who wept over him as she struggled with his baby French, trusting to the intuition that never failed her to heal and comfort. Alex remembered.

Some of us have felt from time to time that in this old world we have found only a land out-worn, devitalized, and cold, but as the funeral procession of our Sister passed through the narrow streets between the rows of Norman houses with their gabled roofs, that feeling changed and there was comfort in the change. One felt a sense of sheltering protection—the promise of a mother old in the ways of pain—that she would care for that which we bequeathed her until such time as we could claim our own. Through the outskirts of the town the columns went, past the old Norman church with its strong, restful lines, and into the cemetery. There, beyond the civilian portion, with its crowded tombs and quaint head stones, upon a little slope above the rest is that phalanx of black wooden crosses which mark the resting places of those who died that a better world might come into being. It was here the procession halted. A grave had been dug in the center, between the two larger plots. Far off in one corner lay a German, a prisoner of war, and one felt that in the great democracy of death all war had been forgotten.

At the foot of the grave stood Padre Johnston; at the head, and on the upper side were grouped the nurses. Further up were the officers, and behind them, and extending down behind the nurses were the enlisted men of all nationalities. The sun shone warmly, and a soft wind came up from the sea. The beautiful service of the Church of England was read through, and though we have all heard it many times, it brought with it now an understanding and a meaning more poignant, more personal than we had ever known. At last the pallbearers stood clear and the buglers stepped forward. Taps were blown for the first time in Etretat over an open grave. We had become so used to the Last Post that we had almost forgotten the real beauty of Taps, but now its piercing loveliness struck home with an added force. Go to sleep. Go—to—sleep. It was an end and a beginning.

A plain black wooden cross will mark that grave; a cross differing in nowise from the crosses which surround it, except in the name painted in white upon its arms. It was suggested that some more elaborate memorial might be fitting, but surely none could fit so well. It is a soldier's cross for one who died like a soldier.

Vassar College Alumnae have established four scholarships for the Vassar Plattsburg, as a memorial to Miss Roberts, who was a Vassar College graduate.

(We have received a similar report of the military rites observed for Alice Ireland, whose death was announced in an earlier issue of the JOURNAL. This detailed description of a military funeral is given to our readers that they may know how our nurses who die in the Service are honored, and that they may understand what is implied, if we have occasion later to say that a nurse was buried "with military honors."—Ed.)

In England, women do the greater part of the work in the building of airships. It is proposed to turn them all into "Wrens," as the members of the Women's Royal Naval Service are called. They make the internal rigging, strands of hemp cord, seated on the ground with feet outstretched, slinging the string on pegs of different colors for the different classes of airships. A young woman inspector wriggles through a narrow manhole, eighteen inches across, into the huge gas bag, lying on the floor, inflated with air instead of hydrogen. Passing through this hole was a rubber pipe, carrying electric light to examine the internal riggings. The girl said, "We are not allowed to stay inside for more than an hour at most; there is really plenty of air, but it is a weird feeling at first. Still, I like to think that I am working right inside the gas bag."
